KITE-FIGHTS IN INDIA.

POPULAR PASTIME AMONG THE BOYS OF HINDOSTAN-

ow Fighting-Kites Are Made-Amount Motion—Cutting an Antagonist's Thread -All Delight in the Game.

In India there are shops where they sell ites very cheap; so very few people maxe them at home. Besides, it wants a fine and praticed hand to make the thin, well-balanced fighting kites. They are made of one (square) shape, but of various sizes, smallest being eight inches square and the largest two feet square. The most on and useful ones are a foot square Very thin but strong paper, resembling tis-ue or cigarette paper, of all colors, is sed for the purpose. But whether the kite is made of one or different pieces of paper, it must be of the same thickness throughout. The backbone is a straight, flat, strong, well-finished lath, and the bow is made out of a cane or a piece of pliant wood half as thick as the backround and knotless. The latter must be of equal thickness and weight throughout its whole length, as on it mainly depends the balance of the kite. The tall, which is merely a finish or an uring only two or three inches at the

THE THREAD USED. Strong eard-thread is used to fly kites with. The English manufacturers would be surprised to learn the amount of cotton thread consumed in India for this pose; one lad using as much as 10,000 yards in the course of a year. Silken thread is also used, though rarely. The knots joining the pieces being made fine, smooth, and strong, the whole length of the thread is drawn through a mixture of fine pounded glass and light starch, which give it a keen edge. The dried thread, which is now ready for fighting purposes, is then wound up on a wooden frame resembling a spool, Great ingenu ity is spent in making this spool or roller light, useful, and handsome.

Next, as to the motion of the kite. Two pieces exactly equal in length off the main thread are tied to the kite; one at the meeting point of the bow and the backcone; the other, a few inches lower to the backbone only. There are two useful kinds of motion besides the ordinary straight one; the wheeling motion, which the kite wheels round and round the quivering motion, in which its head keeps on quivering sideways as it fles up-ward; both being very graceful. A practical hand can give to the kite either mo-2:15 am tion as he pleases. Of course a good deal tion as he pleases. Of course a good deal sits am kite. If it wheels too much you must make the lower fastening thread shorter; or if it leans too much on one side you should stick a piece of paper or fine linen to the bow on the other side. Similarly there are other little means to regulate

* 1:55 am | the motion of a kite. Aş in all warfare, great skill and practice are required to fight well with kites, and maneuvering counts a great deal in 205 am paper actions. But in this, as in many other things which look simple and eem to depend on chance, a good deal of cleverness and practice go to make up a fair victory. An evenly matched fight in this method lasts a long time; I have often spent two or three hours over it. And great is the joy of winning. Sometimes the kites go so far that you can hardly see them, or it gets quite dark; in that case the fight has to end in an unsatisfactory draw. With some, kite-fighting changes from a pastime into a passion. All work, and even eating and sleeping, are abandoned in order to perfect oneself in this art. And great is the excitement which folows a good fight; sometimes (fortunately it is not common) high wagers are laid on it. In small towns there are champion kite-fighters, who devote as much time and attention to kites as some people do to boating and wrestling. In kite-flying there is no distinction of rank, or caste, or age. The young and the old-all take an equal delight in it; you do not come into close contact with other kite-fliers, and, it being an inexpensive game, any-body can indulge in it.—Hindoo Cor. St.
